IV. Motivation Letter (600 word limit)

My strong interest in the right to food arose from three areas of work that I have been doing for many years: women's rights, climate change and least developed countries. My approach to food security and right to food thus lies squarely in relation to the implementation of development, environmental, gender, and human rights related policies. For example, as the UN Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change has documented, volatile food prices are inextricably linked to the extreme weather produced by climate change. Similarly, food malnutrition and stunting are aggravated by gender disparities in access to, and use of, cash: repeated studies have documented that in low-resource settings, children are better nourished when their mothers, as opposed to their fathers alone, have access to cash. This dynamic is a critical determinant of children's potential in many least developed countries, where up to 75% of family income is needed for food.

My effort as SR, building on the prior work of the Human Rights Council and SRs, is therefore to mainstream the fundamental right to food not only in the poverty-reduction sector but across social and environmental sectors. Moreover, I would seek to make implementation increasingly actionable by civil society. Among the strategies I would address as part of the mandate are the following:

1. ENHANCING IMPLEMENTATION AND ENFORCEMENT: In Rio+ 20 the High Commissioner of Human Rights called for global commitments in human rights and double accountability mechanisms to be put in a place to ensure countries are held responsible for their action. In May 2013 the Optional Protocol to the ICESCR entered into force. It grants individuals and to State Parties the right to submit communications and provides an inquiry procedure for grave or systematic violations. I would call attention to these new mechanisms to ensure that States and stakeholders are made aware.
2. TREATING ACCESS TO FOOD AS A LEGAL ENTITLEMENT: Right to food should be justiciable. A growing number of national laws on food security improve accountability, and enable the participation of civil society and those affected by hunger and malnutrition in decision-making and the monitoring of results. For instance, India recently adopted a landmark law on food security. South Africa, Kenya, Mexico and Niger have acted. This welcome trend needs to be extended.
3. ENHANCING GENDER ROLE: I would advance a comprehensive agenda for mainstreaming gender into food security initiatives and vice versa. In addition to expanding women's access to cash, for the benefit of family nutrition, women have specific additional nutritional needs related to their reproductive roles. Over the medium term, greater educational opportunities for women and girls can contribute to improved food security.

4. ENSURING CORPORATE RESPONSIBILITY: Food industry and agribusiness should be monitored to ensure corporate responsibility, and to protect small farmers. My effort as SR would be to find the best ways to reconcile an overriding commitment to equitable and sustainable global economic growth with food security.

5. STOP FOOD WASTAGE: While more than 800 million people endure lifelong hunger, one-third of all food produced is wasted. Efforts to reduce such waste must be an element of any food security mandate.

I am deeply committed to contributing to these goals, and believe the UN Human Rights Council is on the right track. My past work and present aspirations give me a strong desire to shape global policy relating to the right to food. My commitment is to report accurately on disappointments as well as achievements within the scope of the mandate.
